

We would like to thank all the musicians on this recording and the many others who gave their time and artistry to support Jazz at Lincoln Center's educational programs. Rehearsing and playing this music was a joy. For me, the most difficult part of these concerts was calling people, some of whom I did not know, to ask them to donate to our charity. It was worse than being 13 and asking a girl to dance. Sometimes, I would stall for weeks just getting up the nerve to do it. Invariably and without exception, the artists were incredibly gracious, supportive, and already dedicated to the cause of cultural enrichment through quality education. Each one would attribute the development of their artistry to some type of education and support from family, a beloved mentor, or a challenging school environment.

The shows themselves were as educational as they were entertaining. The differing styles of these iconic musicians required our rhythm section to play with authenticity and feeling in an unprecedented diversity of grooves, from the 2-beat gospel moan to the 12/8 doo-wop ballad, from various regional 2-beat shuffles to a Spanish hybrid Bossa Nova to the basic rhythm of jazz, 4/4 swing.

The necessity of speaking a common language led us straight to a sound, form, and concept that is fundamental to us all—the blues. And once we hit the stage, the playing itself—the exuberance of actually improvising together with the pressure of a live audience—gave us the sheer joy of exploration, discovery, and revelation in a perfect moment of real time. When it worked, it was exhilarating.

Before each concert, we would have a couple of days of rehearsal and a get-together/jam session in my apartment. We ate New Orleans food and traded stories and had such a good time that the memory of it increases in intensity with the passage of time and with each telling. Many of the friendships that began at these events have stood the test of time because they were forged by the three-part mandate of swing: come together, be together, and stay together.

The story of our integrated identity has been told over and over again in American music. It was born deep in the quest for freedom that was old even when the first slaves landed on these shores. It is an affirmation of all that we hold most sacred: the possibilities that exist when we choose to create the world anew with each other instead of destroying it in opposition to each other. It also happens to be the challenge facing our nation and maybe the globe in this moment. On this recording and in these concerts, we came together to affirm common roots, to celebrate the diversity of our creativity, and to pass the reality of our best achievements on to our kids. We were, and are, United in Swing.

—WYNTON MARSALIS

Bob Dylan and Wynton Marsalis may not be names you would expect to see together, nor might you think about Jimmy Buffett's music in a jazz format; but that was the premise for five years of annual concerts held to benefit Jazz at Lincoln Center. The exceptional ability of artists to come together through a shared love of the music and listen to each other is at the heart of what you will hear on this album.

These concerts started with two friends talking about ways to engage a new and younger audience for jazz. So many songs from the early 20th century—the period termed the “Great American Songbook”— were adapted by jazz musicians of the time and played in jazz clubs around the world. My suggestion was to bring a new generation in by creating jazz arrangements of our popular music of the 1970s, 80s, and 90s. And we would have the benefit of inviting the songwriters to come play their music in the jazz idiom with the Wynton Marsalis Septet.

Immediately, we felt we had a special concept and amazingly almost everyone we approached was eager to participate and donate their time and energy to support jazz and also have the opportunity to hear how jazz musicians would interpret their music. And here they are, donating again so that this recording can be heard by a broader audience than the lucky few who sat in the Apollo or Rose Theater on those nights.

From day one, these concerts always had a special, intimate feeling to them of people coming together, which is truly what music at its best does. Looking into the audience and seeing a wide range of ethnicities and ages enjoying time together was a huge triumph for us. When a New York Times article in the Style Section referred to our gala concert and dinner as the example of a truly integrated benefit, Wynton and I felt we had accomplished one of our goals.

Listening to all these concerts again makes me remember how everyone always left dancing and singing the tunes for days to come. My life has been forever enriched by the amazing experience I had hearing musicians relating to each other and it has given me insight into how people from very different backgrounds and even interests can always find common ground and a place to get along. I hope you enjoy listening.
